

A Discourse on Method: Meditations on the First Philosophy; Principles of Philosophy (Classic Reprint)

Ren: Descartes was born on the 31st of March 1596 at La Haye in Touraine not far from Poitiers. His father was a gentleman of good family who had retired from military service and had become councillor of the Parlement of Brittany. Rene was the third son. He was sent at the age of eight to the newly established Jesuit college of La Flèche in Maine. He stayed there for eight years, going through the full course of study and showing in the last two years extraordinary proficiency in mathematics. Descartes all his life retained the warm affection for his old college and laid great store on the approbation of his teachers. Here, too, he made the acquaintance of his great friend, Mersenne. Mersenne later became a monk and eventually head of a convent in Paris. He was a man with a great gift of friendship, and his cell in Paris became the centre of philosophical and scientific discussion. Descartes' correspondence with him was constant and continuous, and ended only with Mersenne's death in 1648. Descartes not only found in him a loyal friend, but was through him enabled to get in touch with all the most important thought of the time. In the first part of the Discourse on Method Descartes has related how after his studies were finished he came to the conclusion that for him further book-learning was unprofitable, and resolved no longer to seek any science than the knowledge of myself or of the great book of the world. Seeing the world meant enlisting in a foreign army, and the years till 1619 were spent by Descartes in the Low Countries, serving under Prince Maurice of Nassau.
