

Echoes of the War

Excerpt: ... right now. Mother-- She did? Roger is ready to jump at him. I was willing to speak to you about them, but-- She said, Not worth while bothering father. How did you know? Oh, I have met your mother before, you see. Nothing else? No. Havent been an ass about a girl or anything of that sort? Good lord, father! I shouldnt have said it. In my young days we sometimes--Its all different now. I dont know, I could tell you things that would surprise you. No! Not about yourself? No. At least-- Just as you like, Roger. It blew over long ago. Then theres no need? No--oh no. It was just--you know--the old, old story. He eyes his father suspiciously, but not a muscle in Mr. Torrances countenance is out of place. I see. It hasnt--left you bitter about the sex, Roger, I hope? Not now. She--you know what women are. Yes, yes. You neednt mention it to mother. I wont. Mr. Torrance is elated to share a secret with Roger about which mother is not to know. Think your mother and I are an aged pair, Roger? I never--of course you are not young. How long have you known that? I mean, its true--but I didnt know it till quite lately. That youre old? Hang it, Roger, not so bad as that--elderly. This will stagger you; but I assure you that until the other day I jogged along thinking of myself as on the whole still one of the juveniles. He makes a wry face. I crossed the bridge, Roger, without knowing it. What made you know? What makes us know all the new things, Roger?--the war. Ill tell you a secret. When we realised in August of 1914 that myriads of us were to be needed, my first thought wasnt that I had a son, but that I must get fit myself. You! Funny, isnt it? says Mr. Torrance quite nastily. But, as I tell you, I didnt know I had ceased to be young, I went into Regents Park and tried to run a mile. Lummy, you might have killed yourself. I nearly did--especially as I had put a weight on...
