Not illustrated. 1861 Excerpt: ...a state of mind the fishermen will be in! proceeded Horatia. You'll have every one of them at your feet. I shall tell them that two of a trade never agree. Come, and let us choose. And opening a drawer, Lucilla took out her long parchment book, and was soon eloquent on the merits of the doctor, the butcher, the duchess, and all her other radiant fabrications of gold pheasants feathers, parrot plumes, jays wings, and the like. Phoebe could not help admiring their beauty, though she was perplexed all the while, uncomfortable on Roberts account, and yet not enough assured of the usages of the London world to be certain whether this were unsuitable. The Charteris family, though not of the most elite circles of all, were in one to which the Fulmorts had barely the entrée, and the ease and dash of the young ladies, Lucilla's superior age, and caressing patronage, all made Phoebe in her own eyes too young and ignorant to pass an opinion. She would have known more about the properties of a rectangle or the dangers of paper currency. Owing to know what Miss Charlecote thought, she stood, answering as little as possible, until Rashe had been summoned to the party in the outer room, and Cilly said, laughing, Well, does she astonish your infant mind? I do not quite enter into her, said Phoebe, doubtfully. The best-natured, and most unappreciated girl in the world. Up to anything, and only a victim to prejudice. You, who have a strong-minded governess, ought to be superior to the delusion that it is interesting to be stupid and helpless. I never thought so, said Phoebe, feeling for a moment in the wrong, as Lucilla always managed to make her antagoni...
