Not illustrated. 1907 Excerpt: ... Shakspeare had, in his day, written tolerable verse; but happily, the manager could now boast of two excellent fiddlers. There was, moreover, a report of a certain wise bay pony that, between the acts, was to tell by cards the fortunes of any of the audience; but, we presume, Sir William, like a skilful and prosperous general, took the town without the necessity of bringing up his horse; and thus the cavalry was reserved for future managers and a more enlightened era. We have said John Downes was intent on one of his multifarious duties; in such labour, however, he was zealously assisted by the inquiring Peggy, who, with her mother, had, in an evil hour, taken lodgings in the tenement henceforth to become classical by the indwelling of the prompter at The Dukes. It was even so: in the back room of a third floor in not the most ostentatious part of Drury Lane, lived John Downes; and in the floor immediately above, lived Peggy Simpson, a cordial, frank-hearted girl of sixteen, with a face of sunshine, and a voice like a silver bell. Hapless Peggy! how were her days and nights perplexed and shadowed by the prompter! From only a little week after her sojourn in Drury Lane, may be dated her new life--her second eventful existence. On three occasions, and each following with fatal precipitancy, John Downes had given Peggy and her mother free entrance to the play-house in Lincolns Inn. From that time Peggy became haunted; she no longer lived in a dull tangible world--in a land of figures and counters; but inhabited a sphere pieced out and glorified by the imagination: all things, touched by the new faculty born in the theatre, took new and high semblances; her daily household actions had a foreign grace; she would ask the hour of the day in unconscious blank ...
