I cant tell. I say, isnt it high time to ring? When they went up at night, everyone felt that half the say had not been said, and there were fresh beginnings on the stairs. Norman triumphantly gave the key to Richard, and then called to Ethel; I say, wont you come into my room while I unpack? O yes, I should like it very much. Ethel sat on the bed rolled up in a cloak, while Norman undid his bag, announcing at the same time: Well, Ethel, papa says I may get to my Euripides to-morrow, if I please, and only work an hour at a time! O I am so glad. Then l e thinks you quite well? Yes, I am quite well. I hope Ive done with nonsense. And how did you get on with his arm? Very well--he was so patient, and told me how to manage. You heard that Sir Matthew said it had got much better in these few weeks. O here it is! Theres a present for you. O, thank you. From you, or from papa? This is mine. Papa has a present for everyone in his bag. He said, at last, that a man with eleven children hadnt need go to London very often. And you got this beautiful Lyra Innocentium for me. How very kind of you, Norman. It is just what I wished for. Such lovely binding--and those embossed edges to the leaves. Oh! they make a pattern as they open! I never saw anything like it. I saw such a one on Miss Riverss table, and asked Ernescliffe where to get one like it. See heres what my father gave me. Bishop Kens Manual. That is in readiness for the Confirmation. Look! I begged him to put my name, though he said it was a pity to do it with his left hand;

I didnt like to wait, so I...
