

The Knave of Diamonds (Barbara Cartlands Library of Love)

Excerpt: ...the centre of an unseen whirlpool of emotions that threatened to be overwhelming. And then with a smile Nap put an end to a tension of expectancy that had become painful. Hullo, Bertie! he said, and smote him on the shoulder with a vigorous hand. Ive just been hearing about your engagement, my dear fellow. Congratulations! May you and Dot have the best of everything all your lives! Poor Dot would have fled had that been possible, but she was hedged in too closely for that. Moreover, Nap had transferred her hand to Berties, and the boys warm grasp renewed her fainting courage. She knew he was as amazed as she was herself at Naps sudden move, and she determined that she would stand by him at whatever cost. And after all, the difficult moment passed very quickly. People crowded round them with kindly words, shook hands with them, chaffed them both, and seemed to be genuinely pleased with the turn of events. Mrs. Errol came forward in her hearty way and kissed them; and in the end Dot found herself in Berties vacated place on the arm of Lucass chair, with his steady hand holding hers, and his quiet, sincere voice telling her that he was real glad that the thing was fixed up at last. Later Bertie took her home in the motor, and explained the situation to the rector, who was mildly bewildered but raised no definite objection to the announcement of the engagement. He was something of a philosopher, and Bertie had always been a favourite of his. Nap in fact was the only member of the Errol family for whom he did not entertain the most sincere esteem; but, as Dot remarked that night, Nap was a puzzle to everybody. It seemed highly probable after all that he carried a kind heart behind his cynical exterior. She was sure that Lady Carfax thought so, since she invariably treated him as an intimate friend. The rector admitted that she might be right, but after Dot had gone to bed he leaned his elbow on his writing-table and sat long in thought. I...
