Not illustrated. 1909 Excerpt: ... to be friends, for you are both good friends to me. She has since told me her reason for this step. As long as she remained, she declares that we two would have continued to quarrel; and I suppose that she was right, for when she was gone we fell at once into a sort of confidentiality. Northmour stared after her as she went away over the sand hill. She is the only woman in the world! he exclaimed with an oath. Look at her action. I, for my part, leaped at this opportunity for a little further light. See here, Northmour, said I; we are all in a tight place, are we not? I believe you, my boy, he answered, looking me in the eyes, and with great emphasis. We have all hell upon us, thats the truth. You may believe me or not, but Im afraid of my life. Tell me one thing, said I. What are they after, these Italians? What do they want with Mr. Huddlestone? Dont you know? he cried. The black old scamp had carbonari funds on a deposit--two hundred and eighty thousand; and of course he gambled it away on stocks. There was to have been a revolution in the Tridentino, or Parma; but the revolution is off, and the whole wasps nest is after Huddlestone. We shall all be lucky if we can save our skins. The carbonari! I exclaimed; God help him indeed! Amen! said Northmour. And now, look here: I have said that we are in a fix; and, frankly, I shall be glad of your help. If I cant save Huddlestone, I want at least to save the girl. Come and stay in the pavilion; and, theres my hand on it, I shall act as your friend until the old man is either clear or dead. But, he added, once that is settled, y...
