Hence through the continent ten thousand Greeks Urged a retreat, whose glory not the prime Of victories can reach. Deserts, in vain, Opposed their course; and hostile lands, unknown; And deep rapacious floods, dire bankd with death; And mountains, in whose jaws destruction grinnd; Hunger and toil; Armenian snows, and storms; And circling myriads still of barbarous foes. Greece in their view, and glory yet untouched, Their steady column pierced the scattering herds, Which a whole empire pourd; and held its way Triumphant, by the sage-exalted Chief 2 Fired and sustaind. Oh, light and force of mind, Almost almighty in severe extremes! The sea at last from Colchian mountains seen, Kind-hearted transports round their captains threw The soldiers fond embrace; oerflowd their eyes With tender floods, and loosed the general voice To cries resounding loud--The sea! The sea! In Attic bounds hence heroes, sages, wits, Shone thick as stars, the milky way of Greece! And though gay wit, and pleasing grace was theirs, All the soft modes of elegance, and ease; Yet was not courage less, the patient touch Of toiling art, and disquisition deep. My spirit pours a vigour through the soul. The unfetterd thought with energy inspires, Invincible in arts, in the bright field Of nobler Science, as in that of Arms. Athenians thus not less intrepid burst The bonds of tyrant darkness, than they spurnd The Persian chains: while through the city full Of mirthful quarrel and of witty war, Incessant struggled taste refining taste, And friendly free discussion, calling forth From the fair jewel Truth its latent ray. Oer all shone out the great
