Not illustrated. 1768 Excerpt: ...they generally offer two reasons; first, because by the words of the patent they are left to their own choice; and secondly, because they are not obliged by law: so that you see there is, Bellum atque virum, a kingdom on one side, and William Wood on the other. And if Mr. Wood gets the victory at the expence of Irelands ruin, and the profit of one or two hundred thousand pounds (I mean by continuing, and counterfeiting as long as he lives) for himself; I doubt, both present and suture ages will at least think it a very singular scheme. Is this fact be truly stated, I must confess, I look upon it as my duty, so far as God hath enabled me, and as long as I keep within the bounds of truth, of duty, and of decency, to warn my fellowsubjects as they value their king, their country, and all that ought or can be dear to them, never to admit this pernicious coin; no not so much as one single half-penny. For if one single thief forces the door, it is in vain to talk of keeping out the whole crew behind. And while I shall be thus employed, I will never give myself leave to suppose that what I say can either offend my lord lieutenants whose person and great qualities I have always highly respected (as I am sure his excellency will be my witness), or the ministers in England with whom I have nothing to do, or they with me; much less the privy-council here; who, as I am informed, did fend an address to his majesty against Mr. Woods coin; which if it be a mistake, I desire I may not be accused for a spreader of false news: but I confess, I am so great a stranger to affairs, that, for any thing I know, the whole body of the council may since have been changed: and although I observed some of the very same names in a late declaration against that coin, which I saw...
