

Veranilda

[...]has need of strengthening. You have no children. A glance from the listener checked her, and, before she could resume, Maximus interposed in a low voice: I have yet a daughter. A daughter? exclaimed Petronilla, troubled, confused, scarce subduing indignation. It is better I should tell you, continued her brother, with some sternness, resulting from the efforts to command himself, that Basil is gone to Cumae to see Aurelia, and, if it may be, to lead her to me. Perhaps even now he pointed to the sea they are on the way hither. Let us not speak of it, Petronilla, he added in a firmer tone. It is my will; that must suffice. Of you I ask nothing save silence. The lady arose. Her countenance expressed angry and bitter feeling, but there was no danger of her uttering what she thought. Gravely, somewhat coldly, she spoke good wishes for her brother's ease during the day, and so retired with her retinue. Alone, Maximus sighed, and looked again across the waters. In a few minutes the servant who guarded his privacy was again heard announcing the lord Decius. The Senator turned his eyes with a look of good-humoured greeting.[...].
